A pointed collar finished with soft lace, and a cluster of orange blossoms at the neck. Her long sleeves were full to the elbow and fitted to the wrist. Quantities of covered buttons were used on the sleeves and black of dress, which fell to the floor in soft lines. Her veil of illusion was caught to her head with a spray of orange blossoms, it being forth the same as her skirt, with a shorter veil reaching to her shoulders. She carried a bouquet of roses and valley lilies.

Mrs. Pittman, mother of the bride, wore navy blue marquisette with soutache braid over fourleaved clover with all of them, this column will deal only with the half dozen or so each week who come under our observation—and whom we have special reason to like. For instance—

(1) Two ladies sat in their car at the curb as we passed along. The elderly one was at the further side, but she leaned around to give us a cheerful word. Then we conversed about the weather, and crops, and health—and youth and old age.

"Well," she said, "I'm not so strong as I used to be, but I remember the fact I still have—I can talk as much as I ever could, and that's lots of comfort for me."

Mr. Holt explained in his letter that the bride and groom were both graduates of the University of Chicago, and they are now residing in Statesboro.
